OF THE ROMAN METHOD OF RECKONING TIME.

THE year at Rome was known by the names of the consuls then in office. For instance, when an event is referred to the year when Cicero and C. Antonius were consuls (coss. M.T. Cicerone, C. Antonio), we find on examination of the Fasti Consulares, or authorised list of consuls, that the year 63, B.C., is intended. Ancient authors, however, sometimes date an event A.U.C. ab urbe condita, from the building of the city. For the reduction of this to our modern mode of reckoning, it is necessary to give the year in which Rome was supposed to have been founded. According to Varro, this took place in the year 753, before the commencement of our era. A simple sum of addition or subtraction, according as the event is prior or subsequent to the Christian era, will thus effect the desired transformation.

The Roman year underwent a complete reform in the hands of the dictator, C. Julius Cæsar. Before his time the year consisted of the following months and days, and the difference between this computation and a full solar revolution was supplied by an irregular and often neglected intercalation, with the precise principle of which we are unacquainted:—

|------------|----|-------|
| Martius | 31 | days. |
| Aprilis | 29 | " |
| Maius | 31 | " |
| Junius | 29 | " |
| Quinctilis | 31 | " |
| Sextilis | 29 | " |

| | | |
|------------|----|-------|
| September | 29 | days. |
| October | 31 | " |
| November | 29 | " |
| December | 29 | " |
| Januarius | 29 | " |
| Februarius | 28 | " |

By bearing in mind that March was thus the first month, the etymology of the names of the four last months of our year (namely, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth) is at once perceived and remembered. To remedy the confusion which long neglect had allowed to creep into the calendar, Cæsar's first step was to proclaim a year of 445 days. Having, by this decided measure, once more brought the seasons and the calendar into harmony, he next resolved to begin the year with the 1st of January, and established the succession and lengths of the months as follows:—

| | | |
|------------|----|-------|
| Januarius | 31 | days. |
| Februarius | 28 | " |
| Martius | 31 | " |
| Aprilis | 30 | " |
| Maius | 31 | " |
| Junius | 30 | " |

| | | |
|------------|----|-------|
| Quinctilis | 31 | days. |
| Sextilis | 31 | " |
| September | 30 | " |
| October | 31 | " |
| November | 30 | " |
| December | 31 | " |

But, as this year was still too short by 6 hours and some minutes, he provided that every fourth, or leap year, a day should be intercalated after the 23rd of February. It is well known that the 11' 12" by which the year exceeds the Julian computation of 365 days 6 hours, caused, in lapse of years, considerable confusion, and that the calendar was again brought into strict astronomical accuracy by Pope Gregory XIII., in the year 1582. In the second Julian year, the name Quinctilis was changed into Julius, in honour of the dictator; and the name Sextilis was subsequently altered to Augustus, by the emperor of that name.

The days of the Roman months were not reckoned forwards in regular succession from the beginning, but backwards from three fixed points—the Calends (Calendæ), the Nones (Nonæ), and the Ides (Idus). The Calends were the first days of the month. In the months of March, May, July, and October, the Nones were the 7th, and the Ides the 15th; in the other months, the Nones were the 5th, and the Ides the 13th. Thus, between the Calends and the Nones, each day was designated as the 1st, 3rd, &c., day before the Nones; between the Nones and the Ides, as the 1st, 3rd, &c., day before the Ides. At the same time it must be observed that, in reckoning from one day to the next, the day before the Calends of the succeeding month is the day before the Ides of the month preceding.

to another, the Romans enumerated both extremes; so that whereas the day before any fixed date is called Pridie, the day but one before is called the third day. This and the other peculiarities of the calendar are fully exemplified in the following table, which may easily be extended to form a complete almanack. The letters a.d. are equivalent to ante diem, and e.g. the abbreviation; a.d. III. Cal. Febr. is equal to ante diem tertium Calendæ Februariæ, i.e. January 30th:—

The division into weeks of seven days was, of course, unknown to the Romans. But the distribution of time into portions of eight days, of which every eighth was called Nundina (Nundinae -arum, f'), dated from very early times. This eighth day was originally a market day, by which term nundina is sometimes translated; and continued to be set apart for certain species of public business.

The Romans divided the day and the night, each into twelve equal parts, called hours (hora); but as it was the natural day and night which were thus divided, it follows that the hours were never of the same length on two successive days. Thus, the only Roman points of time which correspond to our divisions of the day are, mid-day and mid-night, which are invariable; and to determine the length and termination of any hour, it is necessary to calculate the length of daylight and darkness on the particular day intended. Only at the equinoxes would the hours correspond to ours, and consist of sixty minutes each.

OF THE ROMAN METHOD OF COMPUTING MONEY.

The as, which was the unit of value in the Roman coinage, was a copper coin, originally of the weight of 120rs. This weight was gradually reduced to 20zs., which, of course, caused a corresponding reduction in the value of the coin. As the as of 20zs. was made equal $\frac{1}{16}$ of a denarius, which is estimated at 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. of our money, it may be taken to represent 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ farthings. Asses of even less weight than 20zs. are still in existence.

The as was divided into parts, which derived their names from the number of ounces which they originally contained. These were the deunx (110zs.), dextans (100zs.), dodrans* (90zs.), bes (80zs.), septunx (70zs.), semis* (60zs.), quincunx* (50z.), trienx* (40zs.), quadrans* or teruncius (30zs.), sextans* (20zs.), sescunx or sescuncia (150z.), and uncia* (10z.) Those marked * are still represented by extant coins. After the as had been reduced in weight, coins were struck of the value of 2 asses (dussis, dupondius), 3 asses (tressis), 4 asses (quadrussis), 10 asses (decussis).

The chief silver coin was the denarius, originally, as its name imports, equal to 10 asses, but afterwards to 16 asses. It was worth about 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. of our money. Divisions of the denarius, all of which are said to have been coined in silver, though not all thus extant, are as follows:—quinarius or victoriatius ($\frac{1}{2}$ denarius), sestertius ($\frac{1}{4}$ denarius), libellus ($\frac{1}{16}$ denarius), sebellus ($\frac{1}{32}$ denarius), teruncius ($\frac{1}{8}$ denarius).

The aureus nummus or denarius aureus was a gold coin, equivalent in value to 25 denarii, or about 17s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Comparing, however, the amount of gold contained in the extant aurei with that in an English sovereign, the value of the aureus, according to the present price of gold, is £1 1s. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Large sums were usually computed by the Romans in terms of the sestertius, which was $\frac{1}{4}$ denarius, or 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ pence. It is denoted in MSS. by the symbol H.S. or IIS. The sum of a thousand sestertii was called sestertium, and equal to £8 17s. 1d. Thus, 600 sestertia = 600,000 sestertii. When the sum exceeds 1000 sestertia (100,000 sestertii), the numeral adverbs in ies are used, to which, if the sum is to be converted into sestertii, the words centena millia must be supplied; e.g. vicies sestertium = 20 times a hundred thousand sestertii = 2000 sestertia. If two of these adverbs be used to describe the sum, they are to be added together if the larger numeral precedes the smaller; to be multiplied if the contrary be the case; it being understood that the centena millia are not to be included in the operation more than once. It is sometimes difficult to know if by the numerals are intended sestertii or sestertia. In the latter case a line is sometimes placed over the figures: e.g.

H.S. $\overline{\text{CL}}$ = 150 sestertia = 150,000 sestertii.

H.S. CL = 150 sestertii.

Interest of money at Rome was reckoned by the month. If one as per month were paid for the loan of a hundred, this was variously called asses usura, or centesima usura = 12 per cent. per annum. We sometimes hear of binæ centesimæ, 24 per cent., and even quaternæ centesimæ, 48 per cent. At the close of the republic and under the emperors, 12 per cent. was the usual and legal rate. Compound interest was called anatocismus anniversarius, or usura renovata: thus, by centesima renovata, Cicero means 12 per cent. compound interest. The following is a Table of rates of interest, which were designated according to the divisions of the as :—

| | | | | | |
|------------|-----------|-------|---|----|----------------------|
| Quaternæ | centesimæ | usuræ | = | 48 | per cent. per annum. |
| Bina | centesimæ | " | = | 24 | " |
| Asses or | centesimæ | " | = | 12 | " |
| Deunces | " | " | = | 11 | " |
| Dextantes | " | " | = | 10 | " |
| Dodrantes | " | " | = | 9 | " |
| Besses | " | " | = | 8 | " |
| Septunces | " | " | = | 7 | " |
| Semisses | " | " | = | 6 | " |
| Quincunces | " | " | = | 5 | " |
| Tricentes | " | " | = | 4 | " |
| Quadrantes | " | " | = | 3 | " |
| Sextantes | " | " | = | 2 | " |
| Unciæ | " | " | = | 1 | " |

OF ROMAN MEASURES OF LENGTH.

The unit of Roman measures of length was the pes or foot. As to the exact length of this opinions vary, but it may be taken = 9710 foot, and accordingly was slightly less than the English measure of the same name. Its sub-divisions were the palmus ($\frac{1}{2}$ pes), the uncia or inch ($\frac{1}{12}$ pes), and the digitus or finger's breadth ($\frac{1}{16}$ pes). The multiples of the pes were, palmipes ($1\frac{1}{2}$ pes), cubitus ($1\frac{1}{2}$ pes), gradus ($2\frac{1}{2}$ pes), passus or pace (5 pes), decempeda (10 pes), actus (120 pes), milliare, milliarium, mille passuum or mile (1000 passus = 5000 pes). The Roman mile is, therefore, less by some yards than the English mile.

OF ROMAN MEASURES OF CAPACITY.

In describing the Roman measures of liquid capacity, the sextarius is usually taken as the unit to which all others are referred. This was a little less than an English imperial pint. It was divided into 12 parts, named like the 12 parts of the as (vid. article on Roman money). The uncia, or twelfth part of the sextarius, was also called cyathus. The divisions and multiples of the sextarius were as follows :—

| | | | |
|------------|------------|----------------|-----------|
| Culeus | containing | 960 | Sextarii. |
| Amphora | " | 48 | " |
| Urna | " | 24 | " |
| Congius | " | 6 | " |
| Sextarius | " | 1 | " |
| Hemina | " | $\frac{1}{2}$ | " |
| Quartarius | " | $\frac{1}{4}$ | " |
| Acetabulum | " | $\frac{1}{8}$ | " |
| Cyathus | " | $\frac{1}{12}$ | " |
| Ligula | " | $\frac{1}{48}$ | " |

The Roman dry measures are nearly the same as these, except that the standard to which they are generally referred is the modius; which was one-third of an amphora, and somewhat less than two imperial gallons. By a reference to the foregoing table it will be seen that the modius was equal to 2 semimodii, or semodii = 16 sextarii = 32 heminae = 64 quartarii = 128 acetabula = 192 cyathi = 768 ligulae.

OF ROMAN WEIGHTS.

The unit of Roman weight was the as or libra, corresponding to the English pound, and, within a very little, equal in weight to 12ozs. avoirdupois. The libra was divided into 12 uncia, or ounces, whence resulted the following weights:—

|-------------------------------------|---|----|----------------|
| Libra or As | = | 12 | uncia . |
| Deunx | = | 11 | " |
| Dextans or Decuncis | = | 10 | " |
| Dodrans | = | 9 | " |
| Bes or Bessis | = | 8 | " |
| Septunx | = | 7 | " |
| Semis or Semissis | = | 6 | " |
| Quincunx | = | 5 | " |
| Triens | = | 4 | " |
| Quadrans or Teruncius | = | 3 | " |
| Sextans | = | 2 | " |
| Sescuncia or Sescunx | = | 1½ | " |
| Uncia | = | 1 | " |

The uncia, which thus very nearly represents the English ounce avoirdupois, was again sub-divided. Uncia = 2 semuncia = 3 duella = 4 sicilici = 6 sextula = 24 scrupula. When the Greek drachma was introduced into the Roman system of weights, it was made = ½ uncia = 3 scrupula. We also find the following sub-divisions of the scrupulum = 2 oboli = 4 semi-oboli = 6 siliquæ.

GENERAL

A, a, the first letter of the Latin Alphabet, corresponding with the Greek Alpha (A, α). In words of Greek origin, the Latin a often represents both o and u (lancea, λόγχη). In compound words, a long by nature usually remains unchanged (gnārus, ignārus); when short, it is frequently changed into i (facio, efficio), or when long by position, into e (cūpio, concipio, conceptus). For the uses of A as a Latin abbreviation, see the Table.

Agricolā, Gnaeus Julius, a distinguished Roman general, and statesman, the father-in-law of Tacitus, by whom his life has been written, was born at Forum Julii in Gaul, A.D. 37, of a senatorian family. He went through the nominal round of the magistracies; was elected consul, A.D. 77, and in 78 was appointed governor of Britain, where he remained seven years, not only distinguishing himself as a general against the barbarous natives of the north, but by his skill in spreading the arts of civilization among the Britons, and reconciling them to the Roman yoke. He was recalled in 84 by Domitian, and, till his death in 93, an event which was said to have been hastened by the jealousy of the emperor, lived in retirement at Rome.

Agrippa, M. Vipsanius, one of the most eminent statesmen of the age of Augustus, was born B.C. 63, of a family before unknown. His friendship with Octavianus seems to have taken its origin at the time when they studied together at Apollonia, in Illyria; and he appears as an intimate adviser of the future emperor, after the murder of Cæsar in 44. In 41 he distinguished himself in the war of Perusium; in 38 he put down a rebellion in Gaul; and in 37 was elected to the consulship and appointed to the command against Sextus Pompey, whom in the succeeding year he completely defeated. His modesty in 33 was signalized by a very large expenditure on public works. In 31 the victory of Actium, where he was admiral-in-chief, was in a great measure owing to his nautical skill; and in 28 and 27 he was consul for the second and third time with Augustus, whose niece, Marcella, he afterwards married; but again divorced in 21, to form a union with Julia, the daughter of the emperor. During the remainder of his life he was active in all parts of the empire as an able and successful statesman, and died suddenly in the year 12, being only in the 51st year of his age. His daughter, Vipsania, by his first wife, the sister of T. Pomponius Atticus, was afterwards married to the emperor Tiberius; his three sons by Julia were adopted into the imperial family. For his daughter, Agrippina, see below.

Agrippina (1) daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa, by Julia, daughter of Augustus, was married to Cæsar Germanicus (see Germanicus), and seems to have been a woman of talent, energy, and character. Both on her own account, and her husband's, she was exceedingly popular in Rome; and after the murder of the latter was received in the city with extraordinary interest and solemnity. She fell a victim at last to the jealousy of her brother-in-law Tiberius; was banished by him to the island of Pandataria, the place of punishment of her mother Julia, and there died, probably by their own act, A.D. 33. Her son Caius afterwards ascended the imperial throne, and is usually known by the name of Caligula.

Agrippina (2) the daughter of the last named, a woman infamous for her crimes, was born at Cologne about A.D. 15, and first married to Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom she was the mother of the Emperor Nero. A second husband was Crispus Passienus, whom she was said to have poisoned. In 49 she succeeded in marrying the Emperor Claudius, although her own uncle, and persuaded him to adopt her son, Domitius Nero, in place of his own child, Britannicus. In 54, alarmed by some incautious expressions of her husband, she poisoned him, and Nero ascended the throne. Her ambition at last proved her ruin. Her son, unable to endure her overbearing disposition, ordered her to be put to death, A.D. 60.

Ahala, C. Servilius Structus, master of the horse under the dictator Cincinnatus, b.c. 439, when Sp. Mælius was said to be conspiring against the republic. The dictator was appointed suddenly in the night, and Mælius, the next morning, cited to appear before him. On his refusal to do so, he was killed by Ahala in the forum—an act which, though often mentioned by Cicero and other writers, as heroic, subjected its author to a trial for murder. To escape a judicial sentence, he went into voluntary exile.

Ammianus Marcellinus, by birth a Greek, flourished in the latter half of the fourth century A.D., and devoted his life to the profession of arms. He is now chiefly known by his Roman History, a work in the Latin language, originally consisting of thirty-one books, of which only the last eighteen are extant. When complete it comprised the events from the accession of Nerva, A.D. 96, to the death of Valens, A.D. 378; though the fragment now in existence commences with the year 353. The first books can therefore have been little more than an epitome. Though the style of Ammianus is very harsh and impure, his history is in high repute for its accuracy and fairness.

Antoninus -i, m. a name of several Roman emperors, the most notable of whom are Antoninus Pius, born A.D. 86; succeeded the Emperor Hadrian, A.D. 135; ob. A.D. 161; and M. Aurelius Antoninus Philosopher, born A.D. 121; succeeded Antoninus, A.D. 161; ob. A.D. 180.

Antonius -a -um, — gens, the name of a Roman family, both patrician and plebeian, of which the latter alone attained to eminence. Its most distinguished members were: (1) M. Antonius, born a.c. 143, cons. 99; put to death by Marius and Cinna, 87. He is usually known by the title of "the orator;" and is introduced by Cicero as a speaker in the dialogue De Oratore. He was rather a soldier and statesman than a professed advocate, and his speeches are described as more remarkable for energy than for literary polish. (2) C. Antonius, second son of the preceding, was the friend of Catiline, and usually supposed to have been implicated in the conspiracy. He was colleague with Cicero in the consulship, a.c. 63, and was gained over to the side of the latter by the promise of the province of Macedonia. The date of his death is unknown. (3) M. Antonius Triumvir, grandson of No. 1, by his eldest son, was probably born a.c. 83, and brought up in the house of Lentulus, one of the Catilinarian conspirators. He was soon noted for the profligacy and extravagance which distinguished him through life. He attached himself to Cæsar, under whom he served in Gaul and elsewhere; whose interests he advanced as tribune of the people, 49, and by whom he was more than once intrusted with the command of Italy. The hostility manifested against him by Cicero in the orations called Philippics, deserves notice at this point; in 44, Antony was consul with Cæsar, after whose murder, in that year, he appeared likely to occupy the position of the first man in the state, till the appearance of Octavianus, grand nephew and adopted son of the dictator (vide Augustus). After a short contest, the rivals were reconciled, through the mediation of Lepidus, who, with them, formed what was called the First Triumvirate, 43; and the bargain was ratified by the proscription of the enemies of each. The victory over Brutus and Cassius at Philippi was gained chiefly by the military skill of Antony, who afterwards met with the celebrated Cleopatra, in Cilicia, and followed her to Egypt. A quarrel with Octavianus was followed by a reconciliation, in pledge of which Antony married Octavia, the sister of his colleague, and agreed to take the eastern provinces as his share of the empire. A second rupture with Octavianus took place a.c. 37, but was healed by the intervention of Octavia. In 37, the Triumvirate was renewed for a second term of five years, though the event was immediately followed by the divorce of Octavia, the self-abandonment of Antony to the charms and the influence of Cleopatra, and his adoption of all the splendour and luxury of an Asiatic king. A final quarrel ensued, which, after much preparation on both sides, ended in Antony's defeat at the naval battle of Actium, September 31, and the ensuing year.

Atilla -a -um, Atilla gens, a family at Rome, both patrician and plebeian, bearing the various cognomens of Atilla, Calatinus, Longus, Regulus, and Serranus. The most celebrated individual of this family was M. Atilius Regulus, a hero of the first Punic war; cons. n. c. 267 and again 256. In the latter year, being the ninth of the war, he set sail for Africa, with 330 ships, defeated the Carthaginians off the coast of Africa, indeed, and owing to the incompetency of the enemy's generals, soon reduced them to great distress. The scale was, however, turned by the arrival of Xanthippus, a Lacedæmonian mercenary general, who defeated the Romans and took Regulus prisoner. He remained a captive for five years, till, in 250, he was ordered to accompany an embassy suing for peace,—which the Carthaginians sent to Rome,—on his word of honour to return if peace was not concluded. The striking story in Livy,—which is not, however, considered to be altogether trustworthy,—goes on to state, that his advice to the senate was of the most warlike character; that he opposed an exchange of prisoners; and, on his return to Carthage, was revengefully put to a barbarous death.

Atticus T. Pomponius, best known as the very intimate friend of Cicero, who addressed a large proportion of his letters to him, was descended from a very old equestrian family, and probably received his surname from his long residence in Athens, and profound knowledge of Greek literature. He was born B.C. 109, withdrew from the contests of Sulla and Marius to Athens in 85, and ever after lived the life of a private gentleman, enjoying the friendship of the chiefs of all parties. He increased by speculation the large fortune which he inherited from his father; was a lover and patron of literature; and an author, though none of his works have descended to our times. He died B.C. 32.

Augustus, the first Roman emperor, was born, September 23, B.C. 63. He was a member of the gens Octavia, originally plebeian, but in obedience to the wish of Julius Cæsar, converted by the senate into a patrician gens. His real name, as well as that of his father, was C. Octavius; and his mother Atia, was the daughter of Julia, sister of the dictator Cæsar. His education was conducted at the house of his grandmother Julia, and superintended by the dictator, who, without male issue himself, seems at an early period to have intended to make Augustus his heir. The young Octavius accompanied his uncle in the Spanish campaign against Cn. and Sext. Pompey, in 45; and was sent shortly afterwards to Apollonia, apparently for the purpose of giving him some military experience. Here he received the news of Cæsar's assassination in March, 44, and almost immediately proceeded into Italy, though still in no public capacity. At this time, however, as Cæsar's legal heir, and in consequence of his adoption into the gens Julia, he assumed the name of C. Julius Cæsar Octavianus. Though hardly twenty years of age, he immediately occupied a high position in the state. He was made prætor, entrusted with the command of an army, and sent against Antony, who had thrown himself into a threatening attitude in the north of Italy. The campaign was brief, and Antony was compelled to leave Italy, while Augustus returned to Rome to be elected to the consulship, though far from having attained the legal age for that office. But Antony, who had in the meantime coalesced with Lepidus, was too powerful to be summarily put down, and Augustus formed that alliance usually called the second triumvirate. Augustus was to resign his consulship, and to obtain the provinces of Africa, Sardinia, and Sicily; Antony was to have Gaul, and Lepidus Spain; and the arrangement, which was to last five years, was ratified by a proscription of the enemies of each. The murderers of Cæsar were the next objects of attack, and the short war was ended by the victory of Philippi, 42, and the subsequent suicide of Brutus and Cassius. A new division of the empire took place, by which Italy was assigned to Augustus, who was obliged to return thither to engage in what is called the war of Perusia against L. Antonius, brother of the triumvir. A breach seemed inevitable between Augustus and M. Antony, but it was once more healed by a division of the empire into eastern and western portions, of which Antony took the former. The naval war against Sext. Pompey next occupied the attention of Augustus, and was brought to a successful termination by the skill of Agrippa (vid. Agrippa). In the mean time Lepidus had gradually been reduced to the insignificance in the state which was his natural position (vid. Lepidus), and the struggle for empire lay between Antony and Augustus. The follies and extravagances of Antony and Cleopatra were not long in bringing matters to a crisis, and the naval battle of Actium, September 31, left Augustus undisputed master of the Roman or civilised world. It would be a mistake to suppose that this supremacy of one man entailed any outward changes in the forms of the state, or involved the creation of a new dignity. Augustus was indeed consul and censor almost permanently; was elected princeps senatus B.C. 28, and pontifex maximus on the death of Lepidus, B.C. 12, but neither the titles nor the pomp of royalty were assumed by him. The usual comitia were held, and the old magistracies filled up by fresh elections; the senate met regularly, and to all outward appearance preserved its supremacy. Nevertheless, the whole power of the state was in the hands of Augustus and a small body of his intimate councillors; nor can there be any doubt that to the Roman people, worn out by long civil dissensions, this interval of repose was most grateful. With the exception of Varus' expedition into Germany, all Augustus' wars were fortunate; his internal administration was mild, and calculated to advance the material prosperity of the state; and the protection which he extended to men of letters has rendered his own name, and that of his minister Mæcenas, synonymous with that of patron of literature. He died in the year 14 A.D. at the age of 76, and was peaceably succeeded by his adopted son Tiberius.

His family, the Anicii, were among the most distinguished at Rome, in the later ages of the empire; and he himself appears to have attained the highest titular honours of the state. He was one of the last Romans who at all cultivated Greek letters and philosophy, on which account his work was held, during what are called the dark ages, in an esteem disproportioned to its real value. Certain theological treatises are also extant bearing his name, but the tone of his principal philosophical work seems to prove that he was not a believer in Christianity.

Brūtus -i, m. The cognomen of many distinguished individuals in Roman history, belonging to the patrician or plebeian branch of the Gens Junia. (1.) L. Junius Brutus, whose history is in a great degree legendary, was, in conjunction with L. Tarquinius Collatinus, the first consul elected on the expulsion of the Tarquins, B.C. 509. His mother is said to have been the sister of Tarquinius the Proud, and he escaped the violent death of his elder brother by feigning idiocy, whence the surname Brutus. He is reported to have fallen in battle against the inhabitants of Veii, who were endeavouring to bring back the Tarquins. The story of his putting to death his two sons, for engaging in a conspiracy for a similar object, is well known. (2.) M. Junius Brutus (not to be confounded with D. Junius Brutus Albinus, also one of Cæsar's assassins, but an older man) was the son of a father of the same name, by Servilia, known by her amours with Cæsar. He was learnedly educated, and distinguished through life for his love of literature. Though he wrote philosophical treatises, and attained some eminence as an orator, his only extant remains are some letters, preserved in the correspondence of Cicero. With the latter, who introduces him as a speaker in the dialogue called after him "Brutus," and dedicated to him his treatises, "Orator" and "De Finibus," he was on terms of intimacy. In the contest between Pompey and Cæsar, Brutus was led by his republican feelings to adopt the cause of the former. His life was especially ordered by Cæsar to be spared at the battle of Pharsalia, and till influenced by the persuasions of C. Cassius, he acquiesced in Cæsar's dictatorship; and though he had never been either pretor or consul, was made governor of Cisalpine Gaul, in. n.c., 46. His share in the murder of Cæsar is well known. His subsequent attempts to gain the favour of the people were fruitless, and he sailed for Macedonia, a province the government of which had been promised him by Cæsar. In the autumn of 42 the double battle of Philippi was fought. In the first engagement Octavianus was defeated by Brutus, and Cassius by Antony. Twenty days later Brutus was himself defeated, and immediately committed suicide.

Cæsar, Ariss, m. a surname of the Gens Julia, q.v. particularly of the dictator, C. Julius Cæsar, from whom the Roman emperors adopted the name in addition to that of Augustus, till under Hadrian it became appropriated distinctively to the heir to the throne; adj. Cæsarianus, C.; Cæsariānus, N.; Cæsariens, O.; Cæsariēnsis, Tc.

Cæsar, C. Julius, born July 12, b.c. 100, cons. 59, dict. 49, cons. 48, dict. 48, cons. 46, 45; dict. 45, 44; cons. 44; assassinated, March 15, 44, one of the greatest statesmen and generals of all time, was sprung from the old patrician Gens Julia, and was early connected with the popular party by the marriage of his aunt Julia with Marius, and his own marriage, b.c. 83, with Cornelia, daughter of L. Cinna. He early showed the decision of his character by refusing to divorce his wife at the command of Sulla, who was with difficulty induced to overlook his temerity. He served his first campaign under M. Minucius Thermus at the siege of Mytilene, b.c. 81, 80, and was about to prosecute his military career in Cilicia, when the news of Sulla's death, in 78, recalled him to Rome. Here he brought himself into public notice by prosecuting Cn. Dolabella, and afterwards C. Antonius, for extortion in their respective provinces, and is even said to have repaired to Rhodes, to study oratory under Apollonius Molo, who had also been an instructor of Cicero. In 74 he again returned to Rome, having been elected pontiff in his absence; and now began in earnest to use every means of conciliating popular favour, in which, as well as in impairing at the same time his private fortune, he completely succeeded. He was soon elected military tribune, and, in 68, questor; while, in the following year, his wife being dead, he married Pompeia, a granddaughter of Sulla, and relation of the celebrated Pompey, whose friendship he was anxious to conciliate. Accordingly, in 66, he joined with Cicero in supporting the Manilian law (vid. Pompey). In 65 he was made edile, and surpassed all his predecessors in the splendour of the games which signalized his year of office. In 63 his unbounded popularity procured him his election, not only to the prætorship, but also to the office of pontifex maximus, against men greatly his superiors in age and official station. The same year was rendered memorable by the detection of the Catilinarian conspiracy, a complicity in which his political antagonists zealously but ineffectually endeavoured to fasten upon him. At the expiration of his prætorship, he obtained the province of Further Spain, and for the first time had an opportunity for the display of his great military talents, in the successes which he gained over the barbarous tribes of the Lusitanian hills. On his return he waived his claim to a triumph, in order to become a candidate for the consulship, to which office he was elected in the year 59, in conjunction with M. Calpurnius Bibulus, and about the same time formed that alliance with Pompey and Crassus usually designated the first triumvirate. The immediate result was the appointment of Cæsar, as soon as his year of office was expired, to the provinces of Gallia Cisalpine, Gallia Transalpina, and Illyricum, with an army of four legions. After aiding Clodius, — who, to gratify his revenge, had passed over to the popular party, — in the ruin of Cicero, Cæsar proceeded, in the year 58, to Gaul, where he spent the nine ensuing years in the series of wars of which he has himself left an account, and by which he has earned, at the same time, the highest reputation as a general and an historian. Into the particulars of these campaigns we are unable to enter; but his expedition to Britain, in the years 55 and 54, must always be regarded with peculiar interest by the English student of Roman history. In the meantime, the death of Crassus, and the brilliant successes of Cæsar, had sown the seeds of dissension between the two surviving members of the triumvirate. Pompey began to see that, if the second, he was still only the second, personage in the state; and Cæsar, on the other hand, whose government of Gaul would terminate in the year 49, was desirous of obtaining the consulship for the year 48. The aristocratic party, with Pompey at their head, was exceedingly anxious, either to prevent this altogether, or by compelling Cæsar to lay down his military command, before its legal termination, to reduce him to a private station before his entrance on his canvass. Accordingly a motion was made and carried in the Senate, that if Cæsar did not disband his army by a certain day, he should be considered an enemy to the state. Cæsar's answer was to cross with his army the little river Rubicon, which formed the boundary of his province on the side of Italy, and to march upon Rome. Pompey, unprepared for so vigorous a measure, abandoned Italy and embarked for Greece. In the meantime Cæsar marched against Pompey's legates in Spain, Afranius and Petreius, and subdued the whole province in forty days. He was now appointed dictator, though only for the purpose of holding the Comitia, at which he himself and P. Servilius Isauricus were elected consuls. His next step was to enter upon that campaign against Pompey which he has himself commemorated in his book on the civil war, and which ended in the total defeat of Pompey at the battle of Pharsalia, August, 48, and his subsequent murder. The supreme power of the state was now practically in the hands of Cæsar. He was a second time appointed dictator, though, instead of returning to Rome, he proceeded to Egypt to engage in the minor contests known as the Alexandrian wars, and that against Pharnaces, and to add one more illustrious name to the list of Cleopatra's lovers. On his arrival in Rome at the end of the year 47, he was again appointed dictator, and again departed to subdue the last remains of the Pompeian party, in the persons of Scipio and Cato, who had collected an army in Africa. The battle of Thapsus, and the suicide of Cato at Utica, closed the campaign, and Cæsar entered Italy, the undoubted ruler of the Roman empire. The forms of the constitution were abrogated to do him honour; he was appointed dictator for 10 years, and censor for 3 years; and even felt the pulse of popular opinion by causing Antony publicly to offer him a royal diadem, which, however, he had the political prudence to decline. The campaign in Spain against Cneus and Sextus Pompey, terminated by the decisive battle of Munda, 45, was the last military act of Cæsar's life. The year or two before his death was almost entirely occupied in consolidating his power, and he is allowed on all hands to have used his absolute authority with a clemency and moderation of which ancient history affords but few examples. The story of his assassination is well known. Most of the conspirators were, doubtless, influenced by private or factious motives; one or two, like Brutus, acted from a sincere desire for their country's good, but, at this distance of time, there can be little doubt that the death of Cæsar was an irreparable mischief inflicted upon the Roman state. Cæsar was not only celebrated as a general and statesman, but was considered in his own day an orator second only to Cicero. Of his oratorical powers we have no specimen except the doubtful reports preserved in Sallust. His merits as an historian are vouched for by his extant works—"De Bello Gallico," lib. vii.; "De Bello Civili," lib. iii. His Latinity is in the highest degree pure and classical, and his style possesses precisely those qualities of simplicity, clearness, and vigour, which we should expect from an unprofessional author of so strong and capacious an intellect.

Caligula, the third Roman emperor, was properly named C. Caesar, and was called Caligula from the caligæ (q. v.) which he wore. He was the son of Germanicus, and therefore great-nephew of Tiberius, and was born in the year, A.D. 12. He is supposed to have been accessory to the death of Tiberius, whom he succeeded in the year 57. At first he behaved with considerable generosity and clemency, even overlooking old offences against his own family and interests, but from the time of a severe illness at the end of the year 37, his actions are only explicable by the supposition of his insanity. His tyranny, lust, and avarice were soon found to be absolutely insupportable; and his murder, in January, 41, was hailed by all classes of his subjects as a happy deliverance.

Camillus, a cognomen of the patrician gens Furia. M. Furius Camillus, six times consular tribune, and five times dictator, is a great patrician hero of the old Roman history. His first great exploit was the taking of Veii, after a ten years' siege, in 396. In 391 he went into exile, owing to an accusation that he had not fairly distributed the plunder of Veii; but was recalled when the Gauls had taken possession of Rome; succeeded in expelling them from the republic, and was instrumental in persuading the people not to abandon the city and emigrate to Veii. For many years afterwards he appears at the head of the Roman armies, making head against the Italian tribes, who, taking advantage of her temporary weakness, were endeavouring to crush their too aspiring neighbour. In 368 he was appointed dictator, to resist the popular agitation raised by Sextius and Licinius, but soon gave up the contest in despair, and laid down his office. His last appearance in history is as dictator, on occasion of a fresh Gallic war, in 367, which he brought to a successful termination. He died in 365, at a very advanced age.

Catīlina, L. Sergius, a man of infamous character, stained with every variety of public obloquy and private vice, who appears as an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship in the year 65, and as the author of a scheme, also unsuccessful, by which the consuls were to have been murdered on their entrance into office on the first of January, and the supreme power seized by Catiline and his accomplices, Antonius and Piso. His second plot, known so well as the Catilinarian conspiracy, was more elaborate, and conducted with more secrecy and skill. A large number of senators and knights, most of them loaded with crime and debt, and to whom, therefore, any change could hardly be for the worse, were involved in it. Catiline himself stood for the consulship of 63, but Cicero was elected, together with C. Antonius, a man not free from participation in the designs of Catiline, though compelled by circumstances to take a different course. But the plot was betrayed to Cicero when on the very eve of execution: he openly denounced Catiline in the senate and to the people, and thus compelled him to leave Rome, and take the field in his proper character of an enemy to the state. The principal conspirators were seized and put to death. C. Antonius took the field against Catiline, and the latter perished in the total defeat of his army. Of this transaction it is hardly necessary to say, that very full, if not always impartial, accounts are preserved in Sallust's History of the Catilinarian Conspiracy, and in Cicero's IV. Orations against Catiline.

Cato, a cognomen belonging to the plebeian gens Porcia. I. M. Porcius Cato Censorius was a native of Tusculum, and came to Rome as a novus homo, that is, a man whose ancestors had not held any of the great offices of state. He was born, according to Cicero, b.c. 224, and died b.c. 149. In 205 he was questor; in 197, ædile; in 193, prætor; in 193, consul; in 184, censor. While holding all these public offices, and in his pro-consular campaign in Spain, for which he received the honour of a triumph, Cato was considered the model of an old Roman citizen and soldier—severe in discipline, simple in habits, and unimpeachable in integrity. His censorship was distinguished by great economical activity, and a vain attempt to discourage the prevailing luxury, and restore the ancient simplicity of Roman manners. To the last years of an unusually prolonged, active, and influential life, Cato continued to display those characteristics which won him so large a share of civil honours and posthumous reputation. He was famous in his own day for his oratorical powers, and was the author of several works. Of these, "De Re Rustica" is still in existence, though perhaps not exactly in the form in which it proceeded from his pen; and of another, the "Origines," we possess considerable fragments. II. M. Porcius Cato Uticensis, so called because he committed suicide at Utica, was the great grandson of Cato the censor, and born b.c. 95. He was prætor in the year 51, which was the highest civil honour to which he attained. He seems to have resembled his great ancestor in character, as well as to have adopted him as a model; and appears, amid all the vicissitudes of the distracted period in which he lived, to have deserved the reputation for disinterested patriotism which he enjoyed. His appearance in poetry—from Lucan down to Addison—as a hero of Roman story, is, perhaps, somewhat disproportionate to the influence which he really exercised on the politics of his day. In the contest between Cæsar and Pompey he adopted the party of the latter, and, after his death, departed to raise the war anew in Africa. His efforts were, however, unavailing, and, after the battle of Thapsus, he committed suicide at Utica, b.c. 46.

Cātullus -i, m. C. or Q. Valerius Catullus, a celebrated Roman poet, whose works have descended to us. He was born in or near Verona, according to some on the peninsula of Sirmio, b.c. 87, and we know from his own works that he was living in the consulship of Vatinius, b.c. 47. He appears to have inherited property from his father, but to have engaged in all the dissipation of Rome, and thus become involved in pecuniary embarrassment. His extant works consist of 116 poems, mostly short, and of great variety in form and subject, being both lyric and heroic, though for the most part examples of those short fugitive pieces designated by the ancients "epigrammatic." The epithet doctus applied to Catullus by several classic authors is supposed to allude to the familiarity with Greek literature displayed in some of his poems; adj., Catullanus -a -um, M.

Cātūlus -i, m. the name of a branch of the plebeian gens Lutatia. Of this family may be mentioned—(I.) C. Lutatius Catulus, cons. b.c. 242, who, when the Romans had been engaged for twenty-two years in the first Punic war, and the Carthaginians were masters by sea, retrieved the naval reputation of Rome by the battle of Ægusa (241), and concluded an honourable and advantageous peace. (II.) Q. Lutatius Catulus, cons. with Marius, b.c. 102, brought, in conjunction with his colleague, the war of the Cimbric and Teutonic to a successful termination. He was also the author of orations, poems, and an historical account of his own campaigns, which are now lost. Having been a member of the party of Sulla, he perished in the proscription of, b.c. 87. (III.) Q. Lutatius Catulus, son of the preceding, an honest and popular aristocratic statesman, contemporary with Cicero; cons. b.c. 78; died b.c. 60.

Celsus, A. Cornelius, a Latin author, by whom a work, "De Medicinā," is still extant. Of his age and country we have no positive information, but from certain expressions in his book, we conclude that he lived in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius, while from the purity of his style we infer that he must have passed much of his time in Rome. His treatise, which is in eight books, is still studied.

Cicero, M. Tullius, the greatest of the Roman orators and prose writers, was born at Arpinum, where his family had long been established, on the 3rd of January, B.C. 106. He was carefully educated at Rome under the most celebrated teachers of the day, one of whom, the well-known Arclius of Antioch, he afterwards defended (B.C. 61), in an oration yet extant, from a charge of having illegally assumed the citizenship. When sixteen years of age Cicero received the toga virilis, and afterwards passed some time in attendance upon the aged Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, from whom he received much valuable practical information. In B.C. 89 he made his first campaign, in the Social War, under Pompeius Strabo, the father of Pompey the Great. During the contests between Marius and Sulla he seems to have devoted himself to literary pursuits. In 81 his first extant speech, that for P. Quinctius, was delivered; and shortly afterwards we find him braving the displeasure of Sulla, by defending Sex. Roscius of Ameria, accused of parricide by a freedman of the Dictator. Although the commencement of his practice as an advocate was successful, the uncertain state of his health induced him to leave Italy for a while (79), and to spend two years in mixed study and recreation at Athens, in various parts of Asia Minor, and at Rhodes. In 77 he returned to Rome, and soon assumed a prominent position at the bar. In 76 he was elected quæstor, having now attained the legal age. The lot decided that he should serve at Lilybæum, in Sicily, when he displayed great address in procuring extraordinary supplies of corn for the use of Rome, then suffering from a scarcity. In 70 he obtained the ædileship, and about the same time undertook the impeachment of Verres, charged by the Sicilians, whom he had governed as prætor for three years, with extortion and oppression. Cicero's activity in collecting evidence, and energy in resisting the cabals formed to get the case out of his hands, was so successful, that shortly after the pleadings were begun, Verres retired into exile, without attempting any defence. The orations which were to have been delivered were, however, published by Cicero, and are, perhaps, the finest of his extant speeches. In 67 he was chosen prætor; and in 66 delivered his first address to the people from the rostrum, namely, that "Pro lege Manilia" by which he secured the powerful friendship of Pompey. He declined to accept a province, after laying down the prætorship; but bent all his energies to the attainment of the consulship, for which office he had many competitors. He was, however, returned as consul for the year 63, in conjunction with C. Antonius. The great event of the year was the discovery and prompt suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy, by which Cicero earned the universal applause and gratitude of his countrymen, being saluted by the first men of the state, both in the senate-house and forum, as "parens patriæ." After the consulship Cicero returned to the senate as a private individual, having defeated the ineffectual attempt to raise a popular clamour against him, for having, to meet the emergency of the moment, put the Catilinarian conspirators to death without form of law. He shortly afterwards excited the bitter enmity of Clodius, by bearing testimony against him in a criminal trial; and the efforts of the latter to destroy his prosperity were from this date unremitting, and at last successful. He even procured his own adoption into a plebeian family, in order to become qualified for the tribuneship; and while holding that office proposed a bill interdicting from fire and water any one who should be proved to have put a Roman citizen to death without trial. After a brief interval, Cicero succumbed to the blow so evidently aimed at himself, quitted Rome in the spring of 58, and went into exile, first at Thessalonica, and afterwards at Dyrrachium. From the letters written during his banishment, we gather that his grief was abject and unmanly. As soon as his departure was known, his banishment was formally pronounced, and his property abandoned to destruction and plunder. But in the following year, 57, a reaction took place; the sentence was reversed by an immense majority in the comitia centuriata, and Cicero returned to Rome on the 4th of September, being welcomed and escorted by a vast crowd of his fellow-citizens. During the next five years Cicero was engaged both in politics and literature; though in the former, he no longer occupied an independent position, and, like the Roman world in general, submitted to the influence of the first triumvirate. In 53 he was made a member of the College of Augurs; and in 52, under the operation of a new law, set out as Præconsul of Cilicia. Here his administration was rigidly pure, and, with the aid of his brother Quintus, he even gained some military successes against the robber tribes of the Syrian mountains. At the beginning of 49 he returned to Italy, just as the civil war broke out between Pompey and Cæsar. After much hesitation, he followed the former into Greece, but took no active part in the contest, fixing his residence, subsequently to the battle of Pharsalia, at Brundisium, where he awaited the declaration of Cæsar's pleasure. In the autumn of 47, he was invited by the latter again to return to Rome; and, till the assassination of the dictator, occupied himself wholly in literary pursuits. His chief troubles during this period were domestic; a rupture with his wife, Terentia, to whom he had been married for 30 years, and a consequent divorce; and the death of his only and beloved daughter, Tullia. The death of Cæsar again raised Cicero to a political importance; and his fourteen Philippics against Anthony were, at the time of their delivery, among the most successful of his orations. In consequence of this, however, Cicero was included by the second triumvirate in the list of the proscribed, and murdered B.C. 43. His head and hands were cut off, and, by order of Anthony, nailed to the rostrum. The extant works of Cicero are so voluminous, and the number of lost books which are ascribed to him so great, that it is impossible here to give a complete list. Of his rhetorical works seven are extant; the most important of which are "De Oratore, libri iii.," "Brutus, s. De Claris Oratoribus," "Ad M. Brutum Orator," and an elaborate work, "Rhetoricorum ad C. Herennium, libri iv.," of which the authenticity is disputed. In politics, a large portion of his book, "De Republica, libri vi.," was discovered in the Vatican library, in 1822. Of the "De Legibus, libri iii.," only parts remain. Of six works on moral philosophy, wholly or in part extant, the most important are, "De Officiis, libri iii.," "Cato Major, s. De Senectute," "Laelius, s. De Amicitia." In speculative philosophy we may mention "De Finibus, libri i.," and "Tusculanarum Disputationum, libri v.," and in theology, "De Natura Deorum, libri iii.," "De Divinatione, libri ii.," Of the very numerous extant orations, they may be sufficient, in addition to those against Verres and Anthony, already referred to, to mention "In Catilinam, iv." We have also about 800 genuine letters of Cicero's—part of a much larger collection which seems once to have existed—which afford most valuable materials for the political and private history of his times. Of his poetical and miscellaneous works, we have but few and unimportant fragments. It seems hardly necessary to add, that the prose Latin of Cicero is considered to be the standard of the language; adj. Ciceronianus -a -um, Pl.

Cinnatus, the name of a patrician family of the gens Quinctia; one of whom, L. Quinctius Cinnatus, is a well-known character in the early and almost legendary history of Rome: appointed consul suffectus, b.c. 460, dictator 458, in consequence of a perilous war with the Æqui, and again in 439, to take measures against Sp. Maelius. The story of his having been called from the plough to assume the dictatorship, was often quoted in proof of the ancient simplicity of Roman manners. He generally appears as a hot patrician partizan.

Cinna, the name of a patrician branch of the gens Cornelia. (1.) L. Cornelius Cinna, elected consul b.c. 87, during Sulla's expedition against Mithridates, on an understanding with that leader that he should make no changes in his absence. His first act was to form a popular party in opposition to the senate, to impeach Sulla, and endeavour to procure the return of Marius. He was defeated and fled from Rome, but raised an army, joined Marius, besieged and took Rome, and massacred the friends of Sulla. In 86 he was again consul with Marius, who died in that year; in 85 and 84 with Cn. Papirius Carbo. At this time, Sulla being about to return from the East to take vengeance on his enemies, Cinna prepared an army to meet him, but was killed in a mutiny of his troops. (2.) C. Helvius Cinna, apparently not of the same family as the preceding, was a poet of considerable reputation, the friend of Catullus, of whose works only a very few disconnected lines remain.

Claudeo, 2. (claudio, no perf. -sam, 3.) to limp, halt, be lame; generally used met. C.

Claudianus Claudius, a Latin poet, who lived in the reigns of Theodosius the Great, and his sons Arcadius and Honorius. Suidas says that he was a native of Alexandria; and from internal evidence it is plain that he was in Rome in the year 395 A.D. The latest historical allusion in his works is to the year 401; and except that he was under the powerful protection of Stilicho and his wife Serena, niece of Theodosius; and that by order of Arcadius and Honorius, and at the request of the senate, a statue was erected to him at Rome, we know little or nothing of his life. His extant works are on various subjects; but the most characteristic are a series of panegyrics on the emperors, and their friends and favourites. He also wrote an unfinished epic, "Raptus Proserpinæ," in III. books; and two historical poems, "De Bello Getico," and "De Bello Gildonico," which are too partial in their accounts to furnish much valuable historical information. Notwithstanding the unpromising nature of their topics, the poems of Claudian display considerable power of imagination and expression; and his Latinity, considering the late age at which he wrote, is remarkably pure.

Claudicatio -ōnis, f. a limping, C.

Claudio, 1. (clodico, C), to limp, be lame; (2) used in Lucret. of the inclination of a balance to either side, of the inclination of the earth's axis, of a disabled wing; (3) to halt, fail, be wanting, be disabled, tota res vacillat et claudicat, C.

Clauditas -ātis, f. lameness, C. Pl.

Claudius -a -um, — gens, a Roman family, both patrician and plebeian. The celebrated Romans who belonged to the former branch of the family (with the exception of those who bore the cognomen Nero, q.v.) we shall treat of in this place. A well known cognomen of the plebeian Claudii was Marcellus, q.v. The patrician Claudii were, from the earliest ages of the commonwealth, notorious for their pride, cruelty, and hatred of the people; adj. Claudianus -a -um, L. Tc; Claudius -a -um, — ria, O, a branch road from the via Appia; — agua, St, an aqueduct begun by Caligula and finished by Claudius; — tribus, L, a tribe settled beyond the Anio, so named from the ancestor of the Claudian family; — leges, or leges Clodias, C, laws proposed by the notorious tribune Clodius, the enemy of Cicero. (i.) Appius Claudius Sabinus Regillensis, the founder of the family, a Sabine of Regillum, whose name was said to have been originally Attus Clausus. He was the leader of a Roman party in the Sabine state, and being opposed by many of his countrymen, migrated to Rome with all his dependants, b.c. 504. These were settled beyond the Anio, and formed into a new Claudian tribe, while their head assumed an influential place among the patrician families. He was cons. 495, and manifested the violent political tendencies afterwards characteristic of his family. (ii.) Appius Claudius Crassus, cons. 451, abdicated his office in that year, in order to become decemvir. The manner in which the decemviral government was overthrown, owing to Claudius' treatment of Virginia, is well known. According to Livy, he killed himself before the time arrived for his trial. (iii.) Appius Claudius Cæcus, censor 312, in which office he continued for four years; cons. 307, 296; is known for having abused his censorial power by appointing to the senatorial dignity men from the lowest of the people, and even the sons of freedmen. These innovations were for the most part set aside by his successors, while some of his public works, as, e.g. the Appian way, from Rome to Capua, are in existence at the present day. In his old age he became blind, whence his surname, but retained to the last a considerable influence in the state. He is also the first recorded Latin author, having composed a poem, which seems to have been known to Cicero, and a legal treatise, "De Usurpa-tionibus." (iv.) Appian Claudius Puleher, cons. 54, censor 50 (when he expelled the historian Sallust from the senate), a contemporary of Cicero; and his predecessors in the province of Cilicia, seems, from his flagitious public conduct, to have sustained the bad character of his family. He followed the fortunes of Pompey, but died before the battle of Pharsalia. He was a man of considerable intellectual power, and wrote a work on augury, which he dedicated to Cicero. (v.) Publius Claudius Puleher, youngest brother of No. iv. (as Claudius and Clodius are interchangeable forms of the same name), is best known as the relentless enemy of Cicero (vid. Cicero). The quarrel arose from a sacrilege committed by Clodius, in intruding on the mysteries of the Bona Dea, which were being celebrated in the house of Caesar. In this matter Cicero took an active part, not only defeating, by his personal evidence, the attempt of Clodius to prove an alibi, but attacking him in the senate with great asperity. Eager for revenge, the latter procured his adoption into a plebeian family, with a view to his election as tribune of the people, on which office he entered in December 59, and shortly after commenced those proceedings against Cicero to which we have elsewhere referred, and which ended in the orator's voluntary exile. This event was followed by the most outrageous conduct on the part of Clodius, who burnt and plundered the houses and villas of Cicero. The immediate consequence was civil discord in the streets of Rome, and fights between the partisans of Clodius and those of the other tribunes who wished to recall Cicero. Into the details of them it is not necessary to enter; they ended in a rooted enmity between Clodius and T. Annius Milo, a friend and partizan of Cicero, in a fray with whose attendants, in the beginning of the year 52, Clodius was slain. Though his character was stained by the most profligate conduct, it is impossible to deny that Clodius possessed great energy, and much of the hereditary ability of his race.

Claudius I. emperor, whose full name was Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus, was the son of Drusus and grandson of Tib. Claudius Nero, by Livia, who afterwards married Augustus. He was born v.c. 10, at Lyons, and was from his earliest childhood of weakly constitution, both of mind and body. His mental deficiency seems to have been chiefly in practical good sense, as he devoted great part of his time, and not without success, to literary pursuits. Up to the age of 50 he took little part in public affairs, and was slighted by his imperial relations, when at that period he was suddenly raised to the throne, on the murder of his nephew Caligula. The immediate agents in his elevation were the pretorian guards, who bargained for a specific donation to each man, the first example of a practice afterwards common. Through the influence of bad counsellors and his own timidity, Claudius committed many cruel acts, which were evidently contrary to his naturally kind disposition, and have earned for him a reputation as a tyrant which is scarcely deserved. For many of his most questionable deeds his third wife, the infamous Messalina, and her confidant, the freedman Narcissus, his fourth wife Agrippina, and the freedman Pallas, must be held responsible. The latter persuaded him to adopt her son Nero as heir to the empire, in place of his own child Britannicus; and when she perceived that he regretted having taken so decided a step, poisoned him, A.D. 54. The literary pursuits of Claudius, in which he was directed by the historian Livy, have already been mentioned; he also completed many useful public works, e.g. the Claudian aqueduct, and the port of Ostia, and many wars were carried on in his name in various distant parts of the empire. In 43 he made a journey himself into Britain, which had just been constituted a Roman province, and after a stay of a few days returned to Rome, and was honoured with a magnificent triumph.

Clēdōpātra -æ, f. was the name of more than one princess of the royal family of the Ptolemies. The best known in history, however, is the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, born 69, and in conjunction with her younger brother Ptolemy, whom she was to marry, appointed heir to the throne of Egypt. She was early remarkable both for her beauty and her lascivious disposition, and by her influence over Cæsar procured about B.C. 48, her restoration on the throne from which her brother had expelled her. Ptolemy was soon after drowned in the Nile, and Cleopatra lived henceforth openly with Cæsar, even accompanying him to Rome, where she bore a son to him, called Cæsarion. At the death of Cæsar, B.C. 44, she fled to Egypt, where she assisted Antony in his operations against Brutus and Cassius. Her influence over Antony became more complete than it had been over Cæsar; they committed conjointly every possible extravagance; she was saluted with titles, expressions of unbounded reverence, and her children appointed rulers over large and important provinces. At last Augustus declared war, nominally against Cleopatra, really against Antony, and at the battle of Actium, at which the queen was the first to fly, inflicted on them a total defeat. After finding that all was lost, that Antony was dead, and that there was no hope of captivating Augustus, she secured herself against being carried captive to Rome by dying by her own hand; vid. Antony, Augustus.

at his post till the bridge was finally dismantled, when, encumbered with his arms, he plunged into the river and reached the opposite shore in safety. In commemoration of this deed, a statue was erected to his honour in the Comitium, and he was put in possession of as much land as he could plough round in a day.

Columella -ae, f. dim. a little column, C.

Columella, L. Julius Moderatus, the most important of the Roman writers upon agriculture whose works are extant, was a native of Cadiz, and from the notices which he gives of his contemporaries, must have lived in the first half of the first century. Of his life we know little, except that he seems to have resided in Rome, and on some occasion to have travelled in Syria and Cilicia. His chief work, "De Re Rustica," in 12 books, is an elaborate treatise on every branch of agriculture, and we have in addition a work, "De Arboribus," in one book, which is also of considerable value. The Latinity of Columella is good, his style natural but copious and diffuse, while certain glaring mistakes in matters of fact induce the suspicion that the very various information exhibited by our author is not in all cases the result of personal observation.

Crassus, the name of a distinguished family of the plebeian gens Licinia; whose wealth is indicated by the cognomen Dives, affixed to the names of very many of its members. We shall mention (i.) M. Licinius Crassus Dives, born about 116 B.C., escaped the fate of his father and brother in the Marian massacre of 87, and joined Sulla on his landing in Italy. Of that general he became, in conjunction with Pompey, the able and zealous lieutenant, occupying himself, meanwhile, by means, some less justifiable than others, in building up an immense private fortune, and thus earning the almost hereditary name of Dives. In the year 71 he was called to command the troops engaged against Spartacus in the Servile war, which he brought to a triumphant conclusion. He was elected cons., with Pompey as his colleague, in 70; but a hollow friendship thus established between them soon ended in open enmity, and Crassus, disgusted with Pompey's popularity and military success, even retired for a time from Rome. In 65, Crassus was elected censor; and, in 60, formed, with Pompey and Caesar, the first triumvirate. In pursuance of the compact then made, Crassus and Pompey were again elected consuls in 55; and in the distribution of provinces in the following year, Syria was chosen by Crassus. Here, anxious for military distinction, and rendered emulous by the success of his colleagues in the triumvirate, Crassus undertook an expedition against the Parthians, which resulted in the year 53 in the defeat of his army and his own ignominious death. (ii.) L. Licinius Crassus, born 140, of a family the connection of which with the last cannot be traced, cons. 95, died 91; one of the greatest orators and advocates which Rome produced, and in that character introduced by Cicero as a speaker in his book "De Oratore."

Dentatus, M. Curius, cons. a. n. c. 290, 275, 274; censor, 272; died, 270; is said to have derived his surname from the fact of having been born with teeth. He is called a notus homo by Cicero, and we are hence to conclude that his military and civil distinctions were the reward of his own talents and energy solely. In his first consulship he brought to a close the war with the Samnites, which had lasted 49 years, and consolidated his victory by the rapid subjugation of the Sabines. His second consulship was signified by the decisive defeat of Pyrrhus at Beneventum, and his third year of office by a campaign against the Lucanian, Samnites, and Brutians. The booty acquired in the war with Pyrrhus he applied, in his censorship, to the building of an aqueduct from the river Anio to Rome. M. Curius was always regarded as a model of the old Roman character; and his frugality, moderation, and severe integrity, were celebrated down to the latest times.

Domitia Gens, a plebeian family, which, in the later ages of the republic, was regarded as highly distinguished. Its chief cognomens were Ahenobarbus and Calpurnus.

Domitianus, the last of the twelve Cæsars, whose full name was T. Flavius Domitianus Augustus, was the younger of Vespasian's sons, and born A.D. 52. His conduct at the time of his father's accession, in administering the affairs of Italy, during Vespasian's absence in the East, showed both his vile natural disposition, and his unfitness for government; but it was not till the death of his brother Titus, and his own succession to the purple in 81, that he was able to exercise any influence on the destinies of the empire. Nor is he free from the suspicion of having hastened the death of Titus. His conduct during the first years of his reign was in many respects laudable. He enacted many useful laws, and paid considerable attention to the administration of justice. But after a brief interval the cruelty which seemed natural to his disposition manifested itself, and his conduct was such as to procure him a just place among the world's worst tyrants. He was murdered at last by his freedman Stephanus, A.D. 96, who was employed by the Empress Domitia and certain officers of the court, who had learned that they were to be the next imperial victims. It should not fail to be remarked, that Domitian was fond of literature, and was himself the author of several poetical pieces.

Ennius, the most celebrated of the ante-Augustan poets, was a native of Calabria, being born in the neighbourhood of Brundisium, b.c. 439. His early life was passed in military service, and it was not till his 38th year that he became acquainted, in Sardinia, with M. Porcius Cato, and by him was brought to Rome. In that city he became the friend and companion of the great and learned, and is said to have earned a frugal maintenance by teaching the patrician youth. He is believed to have attained the age of about 70 years. His numerous works, which are no longer extant, were regarded by his countrymen with the greatest admiration; and from the tolerably numerous fragments which we possess, he must be allowed the credit of having given both strength and refinement to the language. To enumerate the titles of all his poems would be a long and unprofitable task; the chief is, "Annalium" libb. xviij., a history of Rome in hexameter verse. He was also the author of many admired tragedies, which seem to have been chiefly translations or adaptations from the Greek; hence, adj. Ennianus -a -um, Sc.

Eutropius, a Roman historian, of whom we know so little, that no good authority can be produced even for the prænomen Flavius, usually added to his name. According to some critics, he was an Italian; according to others, a Greek, some suppose him to have been a Christian, others, with better reason, pronounce him a Pagan. From his own works we know that he was a secretary under Constantine the Great, and that he survived till the reign of Valens, to whom he dedicated his book. This consists of a compendium of Roman history, from the foundation of the city up to his own times, comprised in ten books. The historian appears to have been desirous of ascertaining the truth from the best sources of information within his reach, and the results of his investigation are expressed in a pure and simple Latin style. On this account the work of Eutropius has for many centuries been much used as a school book.

Festus, Sext. Pompeius, a Latin grammarian and lexicographer, of whose personal history we know nothing, and whom we are unable to refer definitely to any particular century of the Christian era. As, however, he quotes Martial, he must have been subsequent to that poet. His name is known to us as prefixed to a very valuable work in twenty books, "De Verborum Significatione," to which we owe nearly all our information on many obscure Latin words and phrases. It was, it appears, only an abridgement made by Festus of a similar work by a grammarian of the Augustan age, M. Verrius Flaccus, and has unfortunately descended to us in a very mutilated and corrupt condition.

Flaccus, C. Valerius, was a native of Padua; the friend of Martial, and as he dedicated his chief poem to Vespasian at the time of the Jewish War, and his death is mentioned by Quintilian, we infer that he flourished in the latter half of the 1st century. His poem is an unfinished epic in eight books, entitled "The Argonautica," for the most part an adaptation or translation of a Greek poem on the same subject by Apollonius Rhodius. Though his Latin is pure, and his style free from bombast, his work is now chiefly known only to critics.

Florus, Annæus, is the name prefixed to an epitome of Roman history from the foundation of the City to the age of Augustus. It has two titles: "Rerum Romanarum libri iv.," or "Epitome de Gestis Romanorum." Of the author we know nothing; and even his name is matter of dispute. The work itself claims to have been composed in the reign of Trajan or of Hadrian. The narrative is generally accurate, and the general effect produced, striking; but the style is often very rhetorical and declamatory, and the reflections of the author little worthy of attention.

Gaius, a celebrated Roman jurist, of whose personal history we are entirely ignorant, and with regard even to the spelling of whose name, controversies have arisen. From internal evidence we infer that his principal work, "The Institutes," was written in the reign of M. Aurelius. This book, of which we now possess the greater part, was discovered in 1516 by the historian Niebuhr, in the Chapter Library of Verona, on parchments, which had been a second time covered with some of the works of St. Jerome, and is considered by jurists to throw great light on many obscure passages of Roman law.

Galba, a patrician cognomen in the gens Sulpicia. (i.) P. Sulpicius Galba Maximus, cons. b.c. 211, 200, dict. 203, is principally known as a Roman general who successfully conducted the war against Philip, king of Macedonia. (ii.) Ser. Sulpicius Galba, one of the early Roman emperors, enjoyed a brief reign during the latter half of the year 68 A.D. He was born b.c. 3, and from early manhood was looked upon as among the most distinguished of the Romans, and likely some day to attain to supreme power. He was entrusted by successive emperors with various commands, but remained in a private station till the death of Nero, when he was elevated to the throne by the soldiery. His avarice, however, prevented the fulfilment of the promises which he had made to them, and after a short reign of six months he was murdered, and succeeded by Otho.

Gallus, C. Cornelius, born about 69 a.c., died 26, was a native of Forum Iuli in Gaul, now Frejus, and distinguished himself as a poet and orator among the worthies of the Augustan age. He was intimate and influential with Augustus, and commanded a division of his army at the battle of Actium. He was afterwards made prefect of Egypt, but having incurred the anger of Augustus, destroyed himself at the early age of 43. His productions are altogether lost, but he was held in great esteem by his contemporaries, and was accounted by Ovid the first of the Roman elegiac poets.

Gellus, A. A Roman grammarian of the age of the Antonines, who, as we learn from his book, studied for some time at Athens, and spent a considerable part of his life in judicial duties at Rome. His work is entitled "Nootes Atticoe," from the circumstance that it was composed during the long winter nights in a villa near Athens, and consists of twenty books of extracts from Greek and Roman writers, on almost every topic, affording us much information which we should otherwise have wanted. His style is disfigured by the use of many antique and unclassical words.

Germānīcus Cæsar, both inherited the surname from his father, Ti. Claudius Drusus, and earned it by his own German victories. He was in every sense a member of the imperial family, being grandson of Livia, nephew of Tiberius, brother of Claudius, and father of Caligula; and was perhaps the most popular of all the princes of his house, both with the soldiery and people. He was born b.c. 16, and acquired his principal renown by his numerous campaigns beyond the Rhine. From this scene of action, Tiberius, jealous of his popularity, removed him to the East, where he died, a.d. 19, at the early age of 34. He was not without literary talent, and we possess fragments of a translation which he executed of the "Phænomena" of Aratus, which will bear comparison with a similar performance by Cicero.

Græchus, the name of a distinguished family of the plebeian Gens Sempronia. Of this family the two tribunes, Ti. Sempronius Græchus and C. Sempronius Græchus, are best known in history. They were the sons of Tib. Sempronius Græchus, cons. 177, 163, censor 169, himself a distinguished general and statesman, by Cornelia, daughter of P. Scipio Africanus. Tiberius, who was nine years older than his brother, was appointed tribune 133, and endeavoured to pass a series of measures, the particulars of which we cannot detail, but which had for their general purpose to remedy the great inequalities to be remarked in the distribution of the public lands, and to create a class of hard-working small landed proprietors and agriculturists. His popularity was unbounded, and his will was almost law so long as he held office; but at the close of his tribuneship he was murdered in a riot excited by the aristocratic faction, who had always strenuously opposed his reforms, and his laws soon fell into neglect and desuetude. It was not till the year 123 that Caius entered upon the tribunitial office and the policy of reform which had proved fatal to his brother. Like him, he was opposed by the senate and the aristocracy at large, who succeeded in drawing away the people's hearts from him by setting up against him a demagogue, Livius Drusus, whose propositions, larger even than those of Gracchus, were for the time carried into effect. At last a riot arose, in which he escaped with great difficulty from the swords of his enemies, only to fall by that of a faithful slave, who at the same time committed suicide. At a later period the memories of the Gracchi were held in great honour by the Romans, statues were erected in their honour, and sacrifices offered on the places where they respectively fell; adj. Gracchianus -a -um, C.

Horatia Gens, an old patrician house at Rome, to which belonged the three Horatii who fought on behalf of Rome against the three Alban Curatii; and Horatius Coclus, who so bravely defended the bridge over the Tiber against the army of Porsenna, L. Vid. Coclus.

Horätius, Q. Flaccus, the most widely read and among the most celebrated of the Roman poets, was born in the neighbourhood of Venusia, on the 8th December, B.C. 65. He was the son of a freedman who officiated as an auctioneer's clerk, but who being laudably anxious for his child's welfare, sent him to the best schools which Rome afforded, and himself performed the office of pædagogus, or slave who attended the young patricians to and from their lessons. In his eighteenth year Horace went to study at Athens, and while there, threw himself into the cause of Brutus and republican institutions, being present at the battle of Philippi as military tribune. On his return to Rome he appears to have lived for a time in obscure poverty, till introduced as a promising poet to Mæcenas by his fellow-poets Virgil and Varius. From this time his lot was easy and his life happy; he became the intimate friend of the minister, who provided for his wants by the gift of a Sabine estate, and passed his days either in rural retirement or in the society of the Emperor, and all that was noble, learned, or refined in Rome. He was never married, and died 17th November, 8 B.C. in his 57th year. The works of Horace, respecting the chronology of which there has been much controversy and many opinions, consist of four books of Odes; one of Epodes; the Carmen Seculare, an ode written for the Secular festival, B.C. 17; two books of Satires; two books of Epistles; and a longer Epistle addressed to the Pisos, and commonly known as the Ars Poetica. Of the merits of Horace as a poet it is impossible to speak here; it is sufficient to say, that no poet has been more frequently translated into all languages; while so terse is his expression, so idiomatic his language, that none has been translated with less success.

Jūvenālis -e, youthful.

Jūvenālis, Decimus Jūnius, a Latin poet of great eminence, of whom we only know certainly that he flourished at the close of the first century, and that he frequently lived, if he was not born, at Aquinum. It is not improbable, also, that he is the person to whom three of Martial's Epigrams are addressed. The story of his banishment into Egypt is so confused both as to names and dates, that it is impossible to place any reliance upon it. His poems consist of sixteen Satires, in which he very powerfully portrays and inveighs against the corrupt morals of his age. Juvenal has been frequently translated and imitated in modern languages; in English, among others, by Dryden, Johnson, and Gifford.

Lābōrius, Declāus, a Roman knight, celebrated as a writer of mimes; born about b.c. 107, died 43. In the year 45 he was induced, if not absolutely compelled by the dictator, C. J. Caesar, to appear upon the stage, and is recorded to have amply avenged himself by his pungent extemporaneous verses. His reputation among his contemporaries was very high, and, from the very brief fragments of his works still extant, appears to have been deserved.

Lābūrenus, T., a legate of the dictator C. J. Caesar in many of his Gaulish campaigns, in which he, as well as his master, acquired a great military reputation. Although personally much favoured by Caesar, he deserted to the Pompeian party at the breaking out of the Civil War, and was hailed by them as a general capable of opposing their great adversary. But it appeared that, however successful as a lieutenant, he was not fit for independent command: he fought against his old leader in the three great battles of Pharsalia, Thapsus, and Munda; in all was defeated, and in the last named, killed.

Laelia Gen^a, a plebeian family at Rome, of which the two following individuals are known in history. (1.) C. Laelius, cons. 190 b.c., the constant companion and lieutenant of P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, with whom he bore a distinguished part in the second Punic War, and was present at the decisive battle of Zama.—(II.) C. Lælius Sapiens, son of the preceding, was joined in the fast friendship with Scipio Africanus, which forms the groundwork of Cicero's well-known treatise, "Lælius, sive de Amicitia." He was born about 185 B.C., and was consul 140. He is chiefly remarkable as a fine specimen of the philosophical Roman refined by the Greek culture which was in his day becoming common among his countrymen. We find him introduced as a speaker in two of Cicero's dialogues, besides that which bears his name; the "De Senectute," namely, and the "De Republica."

Lēntulus: the name of one of the most aristocratic families of the patrician gens Cornelia. We may mention of its members, i. P. Cornelius Lentulus Sura, cons. 71, the person of chief note involved in the conspiracy of Catiline, and a man of infamous morals, having been expelled the senate with sixty-three others the year after his consulship. He was left by Catiline as chief of the conspiracy within the city, and perished, like his fellows, at the hands of the executioner. — ii. P. Cornelius Lentulus Spinther, is chiefly known from his connexion with Cicero, whose recall from exile he proposed and carried during his consulship in 57. In the Civil War he took the side of Pompey, but we are unacquainted with his ultimate fate.

Lēpidus, the name of a well-known branch of the patrician Gens Emilia.—1 M. Emilius Lepidus, praetor in Sicily B.C. 81, where his oppressions were very great, belonged at first to the party of Sulla, but proposed himself for the consulship in 70, with a view to becoming a leader of the opposite faction. He was elected in conjunction with Q. Lutatius Catulus, who was a member of the Sullan party. The death of Sulla in 78, during the year of office of Lepidus, served him as an opportunity to propose the rescinding of Sulla's regulations in the state; and the utmost animosity was manifested between the consuls. In 77 this broke out into civil war; but in a battle fought under the walls of Rome, Catulus was easily victorious, and Lepidus died, shortly afterwards, of chagrin.—2 M. Emilius Lepidus, first appears in history B.C. 52, when he was appointed by the senate interrex, for the purpose of holding the comitia. In the Civil War he joined the party of Caesar, and by him was rewarded with the consulship in 46. At Caesar's death he formed an alliance with Antony, in virtue of which he was chosen pontifex maximus in the place of the dictator, and when Antony and the senate came to an open rupture, he united his forces with those of the former. The result of this was the formation of the first triumvirate, between Lepidus, Octavius, and Antony; in which Lepidus obtained the provinces of Spain and Gallia Narbonensis, which he was to govern by deputy, himself remaining in Italy as consul. He soon lost all real power; and from 46 to 36 was absent in Africa, a province which he had obtained in place of those before mentioned. At last he rebelled against the subordinate position in which he found himself compelled to remain, but succeeded without a struggle to Octavius, and gave up all his dignities except that of pontifex maximus. He appears to have died B.C. 18.

Livia Gens, a highly distinguished plebeian family at Rome, which at last in the person of Tiberius, son of Livia, ascended the imperial throne: its chief cognomens are, Denter, Drusus, Salinator.

Livia Drusilla, wife first of Tib. Claudius Nero, to whom she bore the future Emperor Tiberius; and secondly, of Augustus, by whom she had no family. Her good sense and power of dissimulation enabled her to retain her influence with the emperor to his death, and to procure the succession to the purple of her own son, — though she is not free from the suspicion of having removed by poison some of his competitors who were more nearly related to Augustus. On the accession of Tiberius, she was soon ordered to refrain from interfering in public business, and died in a species of exile at Capræ, A.D. 29, at a very advanced age, and to the great joy of her unnatural son.

Livius, T. Pâtavinus, the great Roman historian, was a native of Padua, as his name imports, where he was born, in the consulship of Cæsar and Bibulus, B.C. 59. Of his private life we have little trustworthy information. He was married, and had a daughter married to L. Magius, and a son, whom, in a letter, quoted by Quintilian, he exhorts to study Cicero and Demosthenes. He spent great part of his life at Rome, where, in common with other men of letters, he enjoyed the protection and friendship of Augustus, and is said to have encouraged the future Emperor Claudius to apply himself to the composition of history. In his old age he returned to Padua, and died there, full of fame, in the 76th year of his age, A.D. 17. His only extant work is the "History of Rome," originally consisting of 142 books; of which only 35 remain to us, the place of all the rest, except two, being supplied by epitomes, or short abstracts of their contents, which, in default of more detailed information, often supply us with valuable materials for history. The books are at present divided into decades, or series of ten; but it is quite uncertain whether this division was made by Livy himself. The first decade (books i-x.), the third decade (books xxi-xxx.), the fourth decade (books xxxi-xli.), and part of the fifth decade (books xlii-xlv.) comprise, with the exception of a few unimportant fragments, the whole of the history which has descended to our times. The style of Livy is above all praise; and though some of his fastidious contemporaries pretended that they could detect a certain Patavinity or provincialism in it, this is of course imperceptible to us. As regards the matter of his history, he cannot be regarded as an altogether trustworthy. He seems to have taken but little critical pains to ascertain the truth: we know as an absolute fact, that he altogether neglected sources of information which were easily accessible to him, and he probably chose whatever version of a story would appear most picturesque in his own narrative, or most redound to the glory of the Roman name. The result is, however, a story of wonderful beauty and unceasing interest.

Longinus, the name of a family of the well-known plebeian Gens Cassia. Of its members, we shall mention only C. Cassius Longinus, quaestor of Crassus, in his unfortunate Parthian campaign, n.o 53, in which, nevertheless, he earned considerable military reputation by the successful resistance which he opposed to the enemy after the death of his commander. On the breaking out of the Civil War, Cassius joined the aristocratic or Pompeian party, and was placed in command of a fleet. Thus, however, he shortly afterwards surrendered to Caesar; and was not only pardoned, but even employed by the dictator. In 44 he was praetor peregrinus; and it is said that disappointment at not being appointed praetor urbanus was the motive which induced him to form the well-known and successful conspiracy against Caesar's life. The subsequent history of the conspirators has been already narrated (vid. Brutus). Cassius was defeated by Antony at the battle of Philippi; and, unaware of the success which Brutus had achieved against Octavianus, ordered his freedman, Pindarus, to slay him. He is depicted by his contemporaries as possessing literary tastes and acquirements, and in many respects was a man of considerable ability; but his career nowhere displays any high moral qualities, and his crimes were committed for the single purpose of self-aggrandisement.

Lūcānus, M. Annæus, a native of Corduba in Spain, was the son of L. Annæus Milla, and nephew of M. Seneca. His father was a man of equestrian rank, and had amassed a large fortune by his connexion with the imperial revenues. It is said that the talents of Lucan manifested themselves at an early age, and even roused the jealousy of the Emperor Nero, who forbade him to read his verses publicly. On this, Lucan joined the conspiracy of Piso; and though, on discovery, he encountered the infamy of turning informer, and betrayed his accomplices, he was obliged to commit suicide to avoid the more disgraceful death reserved for him by Nero, a. n. 65. The only extant work of Lucan is the "Pharsalia," an unfinished poem in ten books, having for its subject the contest between Cæsar and Pompey. It displays many merits and defects characteristic of the author's youth, and has called forth very diverse criticisms: the style is often forcible, and as often turgid; now rises into the sublime and now sinks into bathos. Yet it seems certain, that had Lucan lived in happier days, and been able to chasten his youthful excess of imagination by the taste of maturer years, he could hardly have failed to have taken a place in the first rank of Roman poets.

Lūcilius, C., the oldest of the Roman satirists, was born at Suessa Auruncorum B.C. 148, and was either the maternal grand-uncle or grandfather of the great Pompey. We are told that he served under Scipio in the Numantine War, and that he was the intimate friend both of Scipio and Lælius. He is said to have died at Naples B.C. 103, and to have been honoured with a public funeral. The works of Lucilius are recorded to have been wholly satirical, and to have been divided into thirty books, in some of which the hexameter verse, in others iambic and trochaic measures were employed. Of these no fewer than 800 fragments remain to us; but as they are very brief and unconnected, the longest extant passage consisting only of thirteen lines. It is impossible to form an independent judgment as to his style and merits. It is generally agreed that the characteristics of early satiric poetry are to be found in Lucilius; great boldness of invective, biting personality, and considerable wit, united with a carelessness of expression and continual want of polish. He is said by Horace to have been an exceedingly rapid and voluminous writer.

Lucretia, the wife of L. Tarquinius Collatinus, ravished by Sextus Tarquin, an event said to have produced the abolition of monarchy at Rome, and the establishment of the consular form of government.

Lucretius, T. Carus, a philosophical poet of the first century B.C.; respecting whose life we have very little trustworthy information. We are told that he was born 95 B.C., and that he committed suicide in 52 or 51, but no reliance can be placed upon the dates. Lucretius lives only in his great poem "De Rerum Natura," addressed to G. Memmius Gemellus, prætor, 58, and which, judging from an incidental mention of it in the Letters of Cicero, may have been published about that year. It is divided into six books, contained 7400 hexameter lines, and is devoted to an exposition of the Epicurean theory of the gods. By demonstrating their total independence of the world and its affairs, by proving that the universe is the result of a concurrence of atoms, undirected by any creative will, he imagines that he shall liberate men's minds from the painful and degrading slavery of superstition. It will at once be seen that the subject is an ungrateful one. Yet it is impossible not to admire the art with which Lucretius has worked up his philosophical speculations into harmonious verse; and it is allowed that, in the episodes which occasionally relieve the abstract disquisitions which form the staple of the poem, he has taken a higher flight than any of his countrymen, and proved himself the sublimest of the Roman poets. Of these splendid passages may be mentioned the invocation to Venus in the first book, and the description of the baneful effects of superstition which immediately succeeds, and the picture of the Great Plague of Athens in the Peloponnesian War, with which the sixth book abruptly closes.

Lucullus, the name of a plebeian family of the Gens Licinia. The most distinguished of the Luculli was L. Licinius Lucullus, born probably about the year 109; and early in life attached to the party of Sulla, whom he accompanied as quaestor in the campaign against Mithridates, 88. He remained in Asia till the year 80, occupied with various civic duties entrusted to him by Sulla; and having then returned to Rome, was elected, in 79, curule ædile, and, by a special enactment of Sulla, prætor immediately on the conclusion of his ædileship. After a short interval spent in Africa, he again betook himself to Rome, to canvass for the consulship, to which office, in conjunction with M. Aurelius Cotta, he was elected for the year 74. At the expiration of his consulship, Lucullus, not without difficulty, obtained the chief object of his ambition—the command against Mithridates. The details of his long and successful campaigns, which lasted till his recall in 66, cannot here be narrated. It is enough to say, that he succeeded not only in driving the king of Pontus into Armenia, but followed him thither, and completely destroyed also the army of his host and ally Tigranes. But at the moment when complete triumph seemed certain, the efforts of Lucullus were paralyzed by two causes. The moderation, a rare virtue in a Roman general, which he had displayed towards the conquered provinces, had incensed the powerful body of knights at Rome, who were the farmers of the revenue; and, in the second place, his soldiers, with whom he never thoroughly ingratiated himself, mutinied and allowed the enemy to overrun once more the provinces which they had lost. The result was the recall of the unfortunate general, and the transference, by the Manilian law, of his command to his rival Pompey. After an interval of three years, Lucullus triumphed in great splendour in the spring of 63; but after that period he gradually withdrew himself from politics, and though he occasionally re-appeared upon the stage of public life, preferred a luxurious and indolent existence to the toils and hazards of party. Indeed, the luxury of his old age is almost as well known as the victories of his manhood. But he was, besides, a man of considerable literary tastes and acquirements, and his house and library were the resort of both native and foreign literati. The exact date of his death is unknown, but we gather from one of Cicero's Orations that he was not alive B.C. 56.—Adj. Luculinus -a -um, Lucullian -a -um, Lucullianus -a -um.

Luscīnus, C. Fabricius, cons. 282, 278, cens. 275; was famous in Roman history as an example of the old Italian simplicity of manners, and some of the last poetical touches, visible in the Roman annals, are traceable in his life. He commanded against Pyrrhus, and it was told with pride, how, when sent on an embassy to the victorious king, he sternly refused all his splendid bribes and flattering offers. Another characteristic story is that, when censor, he expelled from the senate P. Cornelius Rufinus, for having in his possession ten pounds weight of silver plate.

Macrobius, Ambrosius Aurelius Theodosius, was a grammarian of the fifth century A.D., of whom we know nothing beyond the slight information which we can gather from his extant works. He appears to have been a Greek; lived in the reign of Theodosius, and had a son called Eustathius. His principal work is, "Saturnaliorum Conviviorum Libri III." consisting in great part of a commentary on Virgil, and containing much curious antiquarian lore. A second work is, "Commentarius ex Ciceroe in Somnium Scipionis," a philosophical treatise founded on the dream of Scipio related in the 6th book of Cicero's work "De Republica." The religious opinions of Macrobius have been the subject of much dispute, but it seems most probable that he was a Pagan.

Mēcenas, C. Cilnius, the minister of Augustus, whose name has become proverbial as a patron of letters. The exact date of his birth is unknown, but it may be placed about the year 70 B.C.; his family was only of equestrian rank, but was said to have derived its origin from the old Etruscan Lucumos. We are unacquainted with the history of his early acquaintance with Augustus, but we find him acting as his confidential friend and agent soon after the assassination of Cæsar. He seems on all occasions to have been employed chiefly in diplomacy and civil government; and in the absence of the members of the triumvirate was more than once intrusted with the administration of all Italy. It is said that Augustus assumed the imperial power by his advice, instead of attempting to restore the republic; and it is certain that Mēcenas was the principal agent in the changes which took place in the Roman commonwealth, and occupied the post of what would now be called prime-minister. About the year 21, however, a coolness sprang up between Mēcenas and his master, though we are not informed from what cause, and though there was no open rupture, he could not, for several years before his death, be considered as the confidential friend and servant which he once was. His leisure was probably not altogether unwelcome to him. He was enormously rich, naturally indolent, and, in health, a confirmed valetudinarian. His intimate friends were Virgil and Horace, on whom he had conferred important pecuniary favours; he had held out a helping hand to many other men of letters, and his hospitality to such was almost too indiscriminate. In addition to this he was himself a voluminous author, though we may conjecture from the notices of his works in ancient writers, that we have suffered no great loss by their destruction. He was not without the vices of his age; he was debauched, luxurious, and dissipated, and at the same time of a mild and merciful disposition, which was not without good effect on the sterner nature of Augustus. He died, after a very long and harassing illness, in the year 8 B.C., and, being childless, bequeathed his enormous wealth to the emperor.

Mellis, Sp., a wealthy Roman knight, to whom there was a great family in Rome, no. 130, bought large quantities of corn, which he retailed at a low price to the poor. The popularity which he thus attained, excited the fears of the aristocratic party, and Mælius was accused of a design to restore monarchy in his own person. On this the celebrated Cincinnatus, then very old, was appointed dictator, and C. Servilius Ahala, master of the horse. Mælius, seeing from the armed preparations made in the city that his death was intended, refused to appear, when cited, before the dictator's tribunal, and was killed in the open street by Ahala himself; whom we find, in later ages, repeatedly lauded for this act of patriotism. But the very fact that he was violently and illegally slain, seems to prove that no crime could be proved against the unfortunate Mælius.

Mānillus, C., tribune of the people B.C. 66; the author of the Lex Manilia, supported by Cicero in his oration bearing that title, and which gave to Pompey the sole command in the Mithridatic War.
 — ii. M. Manilius, the supposed author of an astrological poem in five books, entitled "Astronomica." The period at which this poem was written is altogether uncertain, some critics supposing that it was produced during the reign of Tiberius, and others placing it, with perhaps less probability, as late as Theodosius the Great. It affords much information as to the astronomical notions of the ancients, as it was undoubtedly compiled with care and learning, though, as a poem, it has but little value.

Marcellus, the cognomen of an illustrious plebeian family of the Gens Claudia.—I. M. Claudius Marcellus, the conqueror of Sicily, five time cons., n.c. 222, 215, 214, 210, 208; may have been born about 265 n.c. The year of his first consulship was signalled by a complete victory over the Gauls and the slaying of their king Viridomarus by the consul's own hand; the third and last instance in Roman history in which the spolia opima were offered to Jupiter Feretrius. The rest of Marcellus' life was spent in the defence of the republic against the Carthaginians; and though the story of his exploits is obscured by much partiality, it seems certain that he succeeded in checking the career of Hannibal, though he may never have gained a decisive victory over him. The capture of Syracuse, after a long siege, and the almost entire conquest of Sicily, are, however, events on which no doubt can be thrown. Marcellus was finally slain in a skirmish with the Carthaginians, while consul for the fifth time, n.c. 208.—II. M. Claudius Marcellus, cons. 51, a friend of Cicero, on whose behalf the oration "Pro Marcello," usually ascribed to the orator, was spoken. He was a member of the Pompeian party, and, after the battle of Pharsalia, pardoned by Cæsar. He was assassinated by one of his own servants, while on his way to Rome, from the literary retirement to which he had devoted himself at Mitylene. His talents as an orator were undoubtedly great, though, as a practical statesman, he appears to have been overrated by the friendly partiality of Cicero.—III. C. Claudius Marcellus, cons. 50, cousin of the above, and husband of Octavia, sister of Augustus. Though a hot partizan of Pompey, he did not commit himself so far as to join his army, a fact which, coupled with his relationship, enabled him to retain the favour of the dictator. He died n.c. 41, and, like his cousin, was an early friend of Cicero.—IV. M. Claudius Marcellus, son of the above; nephew, adopted son, and son-in-law of the Emperor Augustus. It was generally supposed that he was designed by Augustus to succeed him in the empire; but he died in the twentieth year of his age, n.c. 23, not without suspicion of having been poisoned by Livia.

Mārius, the name of a Roman plebeian family, the founder and only distinguished member of which was the famous C. Marius; seven times consul, b.c. 107, 104, 103, 102, 101, 100, 86. He was born near Arpinum, b.c. 157, of humble parents; though the fact that he subsequently married the patrician Julia, aunt of C. Julius Caesar, seems to disprove the allegation that he ever earned his livelihood by agricultural labour. He entered the army at an early age, and is said to have attracted the favourable notice of the great Scipio by his conduct in the Numantine campaign. For many years we know little of his career, except that the rude simplicity of his manners, and his plebeian birth, endeared him to the people. In 119 he was made tribune of the people, in which capacity he successfully withstood the illegal procedure of the senate and aristocratic party, then flushed with their recent victory over C. Gracchus. The praetorship followed in due course, but for the brilliant execution of its functions the talents of Marius, wholly warlike, were not adapted. In the year 109 we again find him employed in a congenial occupation; as legate of the consul Q. Caecilius Metellus in the war with Jugurtha. This was the opportunity of which Marius made use to rise to the highest dignities of the state. He ingratiated himself with the soldiery, spread the report at Rome that Metellus was purposely dragging on the war, and at last, having wrung from his reluctant general, permission to return to Rome, was enthusiastically elected consul, and entrusted with the chief command in Numidia. In two campaigns Jugurtha was subdued; and for two more years Marius remained in Africa, confirming the Roman dominion. In the mean time the Cimbri and Teutones, warlike nations from the north, were hanging on the frontiers of Italy, and had destroyed all Roman armies sent against them. The last of these misfortunes produced the utmost consternation at Rome; in 105 two armies, consisting of 80,000 men, commanded by the consul Cn. Mallus Maximus and the proconsul Cn. Servilius Cæpio, were completely routed, with the loss of both generals. To meet this formidable enemy Marius was elected consul for four successive years, 104, 103, 102, 101; and in 102 was completely victorious over the Teutones at Aix, in 101 over the Cimbri near Verellæ. It is at this point that the character and career of Marius begin to lose their lustre. To obtain the consulship for the sixth time, in which he was successful, he allied himself with the basest demagogues, whom, in return, he did not scruple to sacrifice and to crush at the command of the senate. L. Sulla was now rising into fame and popularity, and in the Social War, when both were employed, eclipsed by his youthful vigour the exploits of his aged competitor. Both men were unscrupulous; and the contest which in 88 broke out between them, for the command against Mithridates, ended in civil war. Marius was driven from the city, and for a time was a wretched fugitive, shunned by all as a public enemy, and on more than one occasion in imminent danger of death. But when Sulla had departed for the East, leaving behind him as consuls Octavius and Cinna, Marius coalesced with the latter, who had been driven out of the city by his colleague, and with him laid siege to Rome. The city soon capitulated, and Marius signalled the event by a frightful butchery of all whom he knew or supposed to be his enemies, for the most part the noblest of the Roman aristocracy. As he and Cinna were now absolute, they elected themselves consuls for the year 86, without the formality of an election; but the old man was worn out with the hardships which he had recently endured, and died in the third year of his consulship, at the age of 71. — Adj. Māritus -a -um, C. Martialis, M. Valerius, the author of upwards of 1,500 epigrams, divided into fourteen books, which are still in existence, was born at Bithynia in Spain, A.D. 43. We learn from his own writings that he came to Rome in 66, and there resided thirty-five years, after which he returned to his native place. His death cannot be assigned to any particular year, but certainly did not take place before the year 104. He appears to have possessed considerable property, and his reputation among his contemporaries was great. The word Epigram, originally signifying an inscription and used to designate any short poem, is applied to the poems of Martial in the sense in which we now use it. Their merits are very high; a constant fertility and pungency of wit, joined with great felicity of diction; but at the same time they do not leave a favourable impression of their author; for they are deformed by most shameless adulation of the reigning tyrants, and a constant flow of obscene and licentious expressions.

Maximus, a surname in the Fabian family, borne among others by the following: — I. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, cons. 322, dict. 315, cons. 310, 308, censor 304, cons. 297, 295; the ablest of the Roman generals in the long and arduous Samnite Wars. We cannot follow the details of his campaigns, which, indeed, have been much obscured by the partiality of the annalists of the Fabian house. — II. Q. Fabius Maximus Cunctator, cons. 233, cens. 230, cons. 228, dict. 221, 217, cons. 215, 214, 209; great-grandson of the preceding, and the successful opponent of Hannibal in the Second Punic War. The cautious policy of delay which he adopted, and which has become proverbial under the name of Fabian, afforded breathing-time for the exhausted resources of Rome to recover themselves, while the neglect of it by the consuls Emilius and Varro was the cause of the fatal rout of Canne. In the later years of the war, when the Roman tactics were necessarily more bold and decisive, the military talents of Fabius hardly displayed themselves to so much advantage as before. He died in 203, and was buried at the public cost.

Maximus, P. (M.) Valerius, the compiler of a collection of historical anecdotes bearing the title "De Factis Dictisque Memorabilibus Libri ix.," appears, so far as we can judge from the indications afforded in the work itself, to have flourished in the age of the Cæsars, and probably in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. The collection contains much that is curious and interesting, though a comparison of its statements, when possible, with those of well-known authors, does not lead us to place implicit confidence in it in cases where such comparison cannot be made. The style of the work is so inferior to the Augustan standard, that many critics have either referred it to a later age, or regarded the work, as it at present exists, as an abridgment of the original work of Valerius. Against the latter hypothesis, however, the internal evidence appears to be conclusive.

Messalla (Messala), a cognomen of the Gens Valeria. Among those who bore it were, — i. M'. Valerius Maximus Corvinus Messalla, cons. 263, censor 252, who for his services in Sicily and especially at Messana, in the first Punic War, acquired the surname which became hereditary in his family. — ii. M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus, a man of some mark in the civil wars which terminated with the downfall of the republic, in which, after some tergiversation, he finally adopted the cause of Augustus, and commanded a detachment of the fleet at the battle of Actium. Messalla was also distinguished in the world of letters, and was himself orator, poet, grammarian, and historian, though none of his works have descended to us.

Messallina, Valeria, the third wife of the emperor Claudius; infamous, and almost proverbial for her shameless licentiousness. Her numerous intrigues, the command which by help of the freedmen Polybius and Narcissus she established over the feeble emperor, and the astonishing impudence of her profligacy, are all painted in the liveliest colours by Tacitus. She was at last assassinated by order of Claudius, A.D. 48.

Mētillus, a cognomen in the plebeian Cæcilia gens. The family of the Metelli were rather remarkable for the general splendour of their position than for the talents of any single member. The number of high offices in the state which they successively occupied was very great, and gave rise to the satirical line of the old poet-Navius, "Fato Metelli Romæ sunt consules." We may briefly mention, — I. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Macedonicus, cons. 143, censor 131, who received his surname from successful campaigns in Macedonia, and who is quoted as an instance of rare good fortune, having been consul and censor himself, and having lived to see four sons successively attain to the former dignity. — II. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Numidicus, cons. 109, censor 102, the predecessor of Marius in the command against Jugurtha. (Vid. Marius.) He is also favourably known as a patron of literature and art. — III. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius, son of the preceding, cons. 80, one of Sulla's generals in the war with Marius, and also commander against Sertorius in Spain. — IV. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Celer, cons. 60, prætor 63, when he cooperated with Cicero in crushing the conspiracy of Catiline; a distinguished and energetic aristocratic partizan. — V. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Nepos, brother to No. IV., tribune 63, when he vehemently accused Cicero of having put Roman citizens to death without trial, and prevented him from delivering the usual address to the people on laying down the consulship. When cons. 57, Metellus did not however oppose the return of Cicero from exile, though his conduct to the great orator exhibits many traces of inconsistency and tergiversation. He probably died in the year 55. — VI. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius Scipio, son of P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and adopted son of No. III., cons. 52 with Pompey, who had married his daughter Cornelia. Both when in office and subsequently he distinguished himself as a violent partizan of Pompey, whose army he ultimately joined in Greece, and under whom he commanded at the battle of Pharsalia. He thence fled to Africa, but was defeated by Cæsar at the battle of Thapsus, 46, and shortly afterwards put an end to his own life.

Milvus = melior, g. r.

Milo, T. Annianus Papiannus, a man of low and ferocious character in the last days of the republic, known to us, because the miserere of P. Clodius, and hence, for the furtherance of his own purposes, a zealous partizan of Cicero. His character and conduct he is hardly to be pardoned for his infamous rival, whom he killed at the age of 22, in an accidental encounter on the Appian Way. The speech of Cicero in his defence, "Pro Milone," was never spoken, as the orator was interrupted by the band of armed men with a mob. Pompey had fled the forum, and Milo went into voluntary exile. He never returned to Rome, and died in exile in the Civil War.

Nevia Gens, a plebeian family at Rome, is best known as having produced the poet C. Nevius. He is said to have been a native of Campania, and was probably born in the first half of the third century B.C. His first public appearance was as a dramatic poet; and we are told by Gellius that his first play was produced in the year 235 B.C. Imitating the licence of the old Attic comedy, Nevius appears to have used the stage as a means of expressing his plebeian opinions, and so unsparingly lashed the great family of the Metelli (vid. Metellus) that he was on two occasions compelled to go into exile. On the last occasion he returned to Utica, where he occupied his old age by writing an epic poem on the first Punic War, and where he died about the year 202. The extant remains of his poetry are too small to enable us to form an independent judgment of his merits, but it is certain that he was highly esteemed and frequently copied by his successors. He appears to have written above thirty comedies as well as several tragedies, and the epic poem above mentioned.

Nēpos -ōtis, m. n spendthrift, prodigal, C; quis ganeo, quis —, quis adulter? C.

Nēpos, C. Cornelius, known to us certainly only as a native of Verona, who died during the reign of Augustus, was the friend of Cicero, Atticus, and Catullus, and the author of several historical works now lost. In the year 1471, however, a work was published entitled "Emili Probi de Vita Excellentium," containing biographies of many of the most celebrated generals of antiquity, which after much discussion among the learned has been pronounced to be substantially the work of Cornelius Nepos, and to be dedicated to T. Pomponius Atticus, the friend of Cicero. The evidence, however, adduced in favour of this decision, cannot be said to be conclusive. The style of the work presents singular contradictions, being often simple, classical, and elegant; while at other times the transitions are excessively harsh and violent. Judging from internal evidence alone, we might suppose that the book which we now possess was an abridgement, by a comparatively late writer, of a work which originally dated from the Augustan age. The biographies which pass under the name of Cornelius Nepos have been frequently translated, and have always formed a favourite school-book.

Nēro, a surname of the Gens Claudia. Of the individuals who bore it we may mention, — I. C. Claudius Nero, cons. 207, censor 201, who won the great battle of the river Metaurus over Hasdrubal, and thus probably saved the city. — II. Nero, the emperor of that name, was the son of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by his wife Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus, and, though originally called L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, received the name Nero Claudius Caesar Drusus Germanicus on his adoption by the emperor Claudius, who had married his mother. He was born at Antium, in December, 37 A.D. and had the philosopher Seneca among his tutors. At the death of Claudius he was saluted as imperator by the soldiers, and accepted by the people without any show of opposition. His naturally weak character soon began to show the pernicious effects of unlimited power and irresponsible authority; and the detail of Nero's biography is only the catalogue of his crimes. Britannicus, the youthful son of Claudius; his mother Agrippina; his two wives Octavia and Poppæa; the philosopher Seneca; the poet Lucan; Thrasea Paetus and Barco Soranus, renowned for their virtue in a degenerate age, are only a few of his victims. His caprice was hardly less remarkable than his cruelty. He appeared on the stage as a musician, and in the circus as a charioteer; and made a journey to Greece in order to exhibit his double proficiency at the Olympic games. At last, when the patience of the empire was outraged beyond endurance, Vindex and Galba rose in insurrection in their provinces of Gaul and Spain, and the latter was elevated to the throne, almost without a struggle. The wretched Nero perished by his own hand, in the 31st year of his age, A.D. 68.
